

Geographic Equity in Youth Development

The needs in Adams County

Adams County, like other predominantly rural counties in Washington state, is particularly strongly positioned to benefit from a state youth development grant program.

Multiple data points indicate that youth in Adams County have some of the lowest rates of access to youth programs in Washington state. Youth responding to the Washington State Healthy Youth Survey reported a significant drop in access to youth development opportunities in 2021, which fell even lower in 2023—the lowest reported rate by county in the state and significantly below the state average.

Alarming, 18.8% of 8th graders in Adams reported that they had no adult to turn to when feeling sad or hopeless (the highest rate in the state)—a youth mental health risk that can be addressed through connection to youth programs.

Chart: Percent of Adams County 8th graders reporting they have access to youth development opportunities in their communities over time. Healthy Youth Survey

Measure: Opportunities for Prosocial Involvement
Location: Adams County

County and State,
% No Adults to Turn to When Depressed

A solution for Adams County

State funding is necessary to address the geographic equity gaps in access to youth development in Washington state.

An open, transparent, and accessible state grant program for youth development is urgently needed as a more efficient, impactful, and equitable approach to funding critically-needed youth development programs.

Youth Development
Strategy Table

Geographic Equity in Youth Development

It's time to invest in youth development

Investing in afterschool, summer, and mentoring programs means investing in Washington's future. Young people spend most of their time outside school, yet access to high-quality youth programs remains limited, especially in BIPOC and rural communities. It's about time for Washington legislators to prioritize youth development and ensure resources reach all young people. Funding youth development means providing equitable opportunities for our youth to reach the future they envision. The time to act and invest in our youth is now.

State investment is essential to advancing equity in Washington State

Parent fees, private philanthropy, and local public funding are currently the primary funding streams for youth development programs in Washington. Availability of these funds is highly uneven across the state, resulting in highly inequitable access to youth programs in many parts of our state, especially in rural communities and communities of color.

Currently, there is no state investment in the broader youth development sector. Left with no open way to access state dollars, some organizations have been able to secure some funding through individual budget provisos, but far too many have not. An analysis of provisos for youth development in last year's state supplemental budget showed an inequitable geographic impact: over $5M of funds were directed to programs in specific regions or counties, with only 6% benefiting youth in counties east of the Cascades.

Further, there are small pockets of state funding for subsets of programs, but without an overarching strategic investment in the sector, each of these initiatives is hampered by the lack of sustainability and capacity of youth-serving organizations to partner in many under-resourced parts of our state.

Map: Percent of Washington State 10th graders reporting they have access to youth development opportunities in their communities, by Education Service District (ESD).
Healthy Youth Survey, 2023

Opportunities for Prosocial Involvement (CPF) across Education Service Districts ranged from 58.4% to 72.2%